Male Victims of Domestic Violence Are “Cash Cows” for Corrupt Law Enforcement Agencies, Courts and Non-Profit Groups Liberal organizations hailed the Violence Against Women Act as a win for women’s safety and human rights. Today, this revamped law has allowed corrupt law enforcement agencies, courts and non-profit organizations to rake in millions of federal dollars using an “arrest the male” policy created by the Violence Against Women Act. By all accounts this billion dollar law fails to address half of all known batterers... women. Male victims of domestic violence make up half of all domestic violence victims in the United States. However, since little money is awarded for male victims of domestic violence these victims are often arrested, prosecuted and sentenced by corrupt judicial and law enforcement officers for financial gain. Most government agencies and non-profits continue to focus on the male batterer-female victim model out of pure profit. This book examines the abuse of the VAWA and how one judge, law enforcement agency and non-profit organization failed to protect male victims of domestic violence for pure financial reasons.
